Black & Missing: Serving the Community of Color Missing Persons

By Kimetha Hill Staff Writer

Every day 2,300 people are reported missing in this country. Forty percent of the missing persons population is comprised of people of color. The Black & Missing Foundation, founded in 2008 works to help solve cold cases and related incidents of persons of color who are missing.

The foundation is a national organization that focuses on all persons of color. Though Black & Missing is located on the east coast, it serves a national audience.

"Our focus and goal is to provide an even playing field for all missing persons. We do not turn away any cases and we are not trying to dishonor the national community, but we feel that equal representation is important," Natalie emphasized. "We want to reunite and provide closure for families."

A non-profit organization based out of Baltimore, Maryland, the Black & Missing Foundation was founded by President, Derrica Wilson and Natalie Wilson, Director of Public Relations. Derrica and Natalie Wilson explained the purpose and need for the foundation,

"We felt missing persons of color were not getting the exposure that their White counterparts were receiving. The foundation was founded in May of 2008, a short time after the Natalee Holloway case was garnered so much national attention. Simultaneously, there was a young Black woman, Tamika Huston, who went missing in Spartanburg, South Carolina. While Natalee Holloway's story flooded the news, the family of Tamika Huston struggled to garner media attention."

Sadly, this story is far too common as at that time missing persons of color represented around 30% of all missing persons cases. However, White missing persons were disproportionately shown across media channels, while people of color were rarely, if ever, given any media exposure.

"Research shows that missing persons of color embody about 40% of all missing persons cases, though that number is rising, cited Derrica.

The media plays a large role in attention given to cases of missing persons and Derrica and Natalie shared insight on the disparity between cases of Caucasians who go missing as compared to cases of people of color,

"There needs to be more diversity in newsroom. Diversity can give precedence into what stories are exposed and the level of exposure. As well, the police department See Missing on C6

restaurant in Chula Vista. The character fea-Face similar to what "Whites" did at the turn of the last century, when dressed up as poor Blacks to be ridiculed on stage. To African Americans then and today, such portrayals are considered offensive and degrading. It was just this kind of reaction to the sign for this new business that lead to complaints to the San Diego Branch of the NAACP and its President, Lei-Chala I. Wilson, Esq. Wilson visited the establishment and informed the people there that the sign was offensive to African Americans and needed to come down within 48 hours. Ms. Wilson later recounted in discussing this issue with the Voice & Viewpoint, that the woman present seemed to ignore her request and told her to have a nice day. The matter didn't stop there. Mr. Roger Duncan, a North County resident received comments about this sign from friends living in Chula Vista, who by this time had seen the sign. Mr. Duncan wrote to the Mayor and City Council members of Chula Vista about the offensiveness of the sign and he said he received almost an immediate response from the Deputy Mayor, Rudy Ramirez, of the City of Chula Vista, who informed him that the City's Code Enforcement Division was already investigating the sign. As of Monday August 1, 2011, the sign had been removed and replaced with an octopus, to represent Mariscos El Prieto , translated "Darkie's Seafood." The name Mariscos El Prieto, is supposedly very popular as a seafood outlet in Mexico, but the issue over the particular character displayed, is not a first time occurrence here in the United States. In 2005, Mexico issued at least five stamps featuring this character known as Memin Pinguin which is evidently based on a 1940's fictional character of Cuban Mexican ancestry. The fictional comic book character, created by Yolanda Vargas, lived on the outskirts of Mexico City and was forever getting into trouble. At the time the stamps were issued, over 100 people including NAACP Chairman Julian Bond and local Branch President Wilson, wrote to then President of Mexico Vicente Fox and made this statement to him: "Given the rich See Sinage on C6

Rosa Parks Essay Reveals Rape Attempt

Associated Press

Long before Rosa Parks rose to fame for her role in the civil rights movement, she wrote a detailed account of her attempted rape by a white neighbor who employed her as a housekeeper in 1931, the Associated Press reports:

The six-page essay, written in her own hand many years after the incident, is among thousands of her personal items currently residing in the Manhattan warehouse and cramped offices of Guernsey's Auctioneers, which has been selected by a Michigan court to find an institution to buy and preserve the complete archive.

The Associated Press was provided with some samples of the documents in the archive, including portions of the essay. Archivists had reviewed the documents for Guernsey's and provided descriptions of their contents.

Civil rights historian Danielle McGuire said she had never before heard of the attempted rape of Parks and called the find among Parks' papers astounding.

It helps explain what triggered Parks' lifelong campaign against the ritualistic rape of black this issue continues to surface. Today, the comic book character continues to enjoy hundreds of thousands of readers in Latin American countries, but this should not be seen as an excuse to use the character in the United States, where racism has made the character as offensive as some of the stories surrounding Memin in Mexican and Latin American publications.

The real point here is not to allow objection and protest to be used to promote and market a restaurant that otherwise might go unnoticed by most folks.

women by white men, said McGuire, whose recent book "At the Dark End of the Street" examines how economic intimidation and sexual violence were used to derail the freedom movement and how it went unpunished during the Jim Crow era.

Youth

Dr. Warren closes his piece with two questions and I will respectfully try to answer them as best I can.

First he asks; where are the jobs this summer?

The answer: There are jobs for young people in all sectors of the economy but these jobs are scarce and very hard to obtain.

It is worth noting that Qualcomm has put 21 youth to work this summer within their corporate headquarters, CareFusion has employed 20 students and both Sea World and Jack in the Box have hired more than 50 students each as part of San Diego Workforce Partnership's Hire-A-Youth program. These youth have come from Southeastern San Diego, City Heights and other communities throughout the City and County of San Diego. Through the leadership of Council President Tony Young, the City of San Diego has provided additional Community Development Block Grant (CDBG) funding to help place more than (200) youth into jobs throughout the City of San Diego. This program is off to a later start with most students starting work experiences in August and continuing into the upcoming school year.

Next Dr. Warren asks; how many youth jobs does funding exist for?

The answer: Not nearly enough. Through federal funding, city funding and additional private sector donations and placements, San Diego Workforce Partnership will be able to place between 750 and 900 youth into summer jobs throughout San Diego County. Considering that there are more than 200,000 working age youth in the County of San Diego, this number is anemic. And while many youth will find jobs on their own, or opt not to work this summer because they are engaged in positive activities (camps, academic programs, sports, volunteer work, etc.)

ingly out of reach. What makes this situation even more frustrating during this lingering recession is that there may be no clearer example of true economic stimulus than a summer job. A return on investment study conducted by San Diego Workforce Partnership in the summer of 2009 shows that every $1 a student earns has an impact in the local economy of more than $1.90 (meaning that the money will be spent and respent in shares the story with media, which also determines which cases are exposed."

Natalie went on to state, "The community needs to speak up, however, there is this "no snitching" mentality and we need to get rid of that. We need to demand that we get equal justice so that our missing persons get equal time."

"We also need to follow up once a report has been filed. There are cases where families have filed police however those reports; reports were never formally filed by the police. Therefore it is important to follow up on those initial reports," added Derrica.

The Black & Missing

Foundation has a good relationship with police department.

"We are a fairly new organization and we have an excellent rapport with the District of Columbia Police Chief and Assistant Police Chief. We work together with the police department as they inform us of missing persons cases," explained Natalie.

A good working relationship is essential to solving cases and the Black & Missing Foundation successfully bridges communication between law enforcement and families with missing persons.

"We work with families to be an advocate and mediator with the police department. We're seen as a resource for the community and the police department."

For families dealing with missing relatives, there are important steps to take on the path to solving that case,

"You must report your loved one missing. If you know something isn't right, go to the police. When you file a report make sure to have a recent photo of the person missing as time is of the essence," Natalie and Derrica emphasized.

"Provide police and media with as much information as possible. It's also important to communicate and get to know your neighbors. As parents, we must talk to our children and listen; children have so much to say, and sometimes as parents we overshadow our children with parental rights," they emphasized.

"Also, it's important to be involved in schools and churches in your community. When one of your neighbors is dealing with a missing loved one, help them with searches and pass out fliers. Anything is better than sitting and waiting for something to happen."

For cases of missing persons to be solved, Black & Missing urges that it is important that people trust law enforcement. Families and friends of missing persons must get a case number and follow up on those reports.

President of Black & Missing, Derrica Wilson is a former police officer, having worked with the Arlington County Police Department and the City of Falls Church Police Department. Natalie Wilson is the public affairs specialist for the District of Columbia Office of Tax and Revenue in addition to her role as co-founder and director of public relations for Black & Missing.
